FUND MANAGER COMMENTARY AT 31 OCT 2017

Buying shares that have collapsed is one of the hardest actions an investor can take. That said, buying after an explosive move higher is exponentially more difficult. The investor is forced to admit his mistake in not having participated earlier, never mind the fear that he's the last lemming to buy, right before the crowd marches off the cliff. "Buy low, sell high" has been drummed into the collective mindset since time immemorial. In practice it's never that easy. And of course, what appears 'high' today could well turn out to be 'low' in the fullness of time.

In this vein, I must issue a mea culpa. The fund has held shares in Amazon.com for roughly two years, mostly in relatively small size. Over that period, my conviction in Amazon's competitive advantages and growth opportunities has steadily grown. Amazon's recent acquisition of Whole Foods further reinforces that view. What held me back from holding a bigger position? They say that "Perfect is the enemy of good"; for various reasons, I'd been waiting patiently for a fat pitch that never materialised (in this case, a market-induced sell-off) in order to load up. Insult was added to injury as Amazon delivered stunning third quarter results, sending the shares rocketing higher.

What do you when you've made a mistake? Two things: 1) admit it and 2) fix it! After incorporating a stronger outlook, Amazon's shares still offer attractive prospective returns. I've increased the position to a more appropriate 3% weight; if the fat pitch does come, I'll be ready.
